Resumo

The entrepreneur's health is a growing theme in the scientific literature due to the impacts that it may have on the venture and on the people linked to the entrepreneur. The present research aimed to analyze the corpus of research about the entrepreneur's physical and psychological health in order to find out the general layout of the scientific knowledge of the area. To achieve this objective, a systematic literature review of the research about the entrepreneur's health was done using R's bibliometrix package. The results presented an annual growth rate of the scientific production of 15.46%, confirming the increasing interest in this theme, and the main journals publishing about this topic are specialized in health and entrepreneurship. Most part of the authors were affiliated to universities from developed countries and by the frequency of the keywords, it is possible to see that the articles discussed not only the physical health of the entrepreneur but also the well-being and the mental health. Finally, the publications show a growth trend, especially about well-being and mental health. Some research gaps, like which are the main physical and psychological problems faced by entrepreneurs and how they can avoid these problems, were also presented.
